

We Claim:

1. A method for radio resource allocation in a wireless cellular system that employs frequency reuse, said method comprising the steps of:
measuring cellular traffic load in said system as a function of available spectrum; reusing co-channel resources within said system; and progressively increasing said co-channel resource reuse as said traffic load increases in accordance with a predetermined priority in order to maximum the carrier to interference ratio.